The serpent is a bass wind instrument, descended from the cornett, and a distant ancestor of the tuba, with a mouthpiece like a brass instrument but side holes like a woodwind. It is usually a long cone bent into a snakelike shape, hence the name. The serpent is closely related to the cornett, although it is not part of the cornett family, due to the absence of a thumb hole.

En effet, de cette ancienne époque jusqu'à aujourd'hui, les peuples indigènes l'ont associé au cycle de croissance du maïs, comparant les feuilles vertes de la plante à des plumes de quetzal et les épis à des écailles de serpent [6].
